PROFESSIONAL INTERESTS

My research program reflects three intersecting areas: interpersonal violence (child and adolescent sexual victimization, child maltreatment, adult revictimization), trauma, and emotion dysregulation. I am interested in how interpersonal violence early in development affects one's later capacity to self-regulate and cope with stressors, and how maladaptive coping strategies emanating from emotion dysregulation increase vulnerability among survivors. I am particularly interested in how sexual violence and emotion dysregulation intersect and result in trauma such as PTSD, substance use disorders, risky sexual behavior, and complex clinical presentations. Recent studies have examined intimate partner violence revictimization, the potential cumulative impact of revictimization on emotion dysregulation and psychopathology, and the role of shame in complex trauma presentations. Related, my applied research interests involve examining the utility of the principles of mindfulness, as well as meditation and yoga, in the alleviation of traumatic sequelae as well as to improve general mental health. Projects include examination of emotion regulation and related constructs such as mindfulness, self-compassion, and executive functioning in relation to sexual assault; adult survivors of child maltreatment; and compulsive shopping and hoarding behavior among trauma survivors. My clinical work focuses on adult survivors of childhood abuse and trauma, and is grounded in a cognitive-behavioral perspective. I teach graduate courses in ethics, cognitive-behavioral psychotherapy, trauma-focused psychotherapy, interviewing and diagnosis, and substance abuse; I also teach abnormal psychology and senior capstones at the undergraduate level.
